Tobacconist Instructs a Customer in the Art-Inhaling the Smoke. I always prefer to make my own eigerettes, and then I know they contain no opium or other poisonous in-gredients," said a gentleman yesterday as he stood in a cigar-store door and delicately twirled some tobacco and a small piece of rice paper between

"That's where you and I differ," said the dealer, taking up the thread of conversation. "A man can get all the cigarettes he wants and there won't be a particle of opium in them. Opium is too expensive a drug to allow of its being used in a cigarette, a package of which will cost 15 cents, and the public generally seem to be appreciating this fact. Opium is put in cigarettes, but it isn't every dealer who will handie them. They are higher priced, and are only called for by those who desire that kind of a smoke. You ask how it is put in. Well, it is pulver-ized, and scattered in that way. As far as my custom goes, cigarettes are more popular now than they were two "I don't see how people can smoke the things. There is no strength to them, and it is like puffing that much vapor," said a listener who was engaged in vigorously coaxing the smoke through a big 5-cent eigar. 'That is because you don't know how to smoke a cigarette," answered the dealer, as he drew forth one and proceeded to light it. "Now, if you was to smoke a cigarette you would put it in your mouth and allow the saliva to moisten the end of it before you had taken two puffs, and then you would be compelled to bite off little cuts of tobacco, which makes it very annoying. Well, in the first place you must learn to overcome that and hold it between your lips. Then, to add to the unpleasantness you would get out of it, you would proceed to smoke it as if you were smoking a pipe-that is, take a draw and blow it out of your mouth. A eigarette is not worth the smoking that way. But if you should persevere and learn to smoke this way

Then the dealer took a draw and alwed the smoke to pass out through the nostrils in two gossamer streaks, and followed this by inhaling the smoke and allowing it to fill his lungs and then pass out with the regular respiration. Then he took other inhalations and caused the smoke to pass out of his mouth and be drawn through the nostrils into the lungs, only to pass out again through the mouth. He followed this by sending wreaths of smoke floating across the room, and then by blowing rings through each other, until the man with the clear was amazed.

"I suppose the doctors would say so; but so they would say that it would kill a man to smoke eigars or enew tobacco, or do anything that there is any pleasure in. For my part, I don't care what they say. I believe it will injure the lungs no more than it does to inhale the stench from the Chicago river, or the coal smoke from the thousand and one buildings, or the dust and dirt that floats in the atmosphere, or the poison which arises from filthy streets, or numerous other things which the doctors say nothing about."
"That's so," answered the
